Shipbuilding.

Shipbuilding in some of its chief characteristics is a very different art from what it was only a few years ago. The substitution, first, of iron for wood, and, second, steel for both wood and iron, will soon have effected an entire revolution. Canada, next after Maine, was the stronghold of wooden shipbuilding, but a feeling bordering on consternation has been caused in the Dominion by the an-nouncement that a firm who for many years have been among the largest owners of sailing ships in America, building most of their vessels in St. John and vicinity, have just closed a contract in England for a sailing ship of 1500 tons, to be built of iron. Wooden shipbuilding in Canada for several years has been a declining industry and this last movement is regarded as a presage of its well nigh final extinction. The so-called "soft-wood" ships of the Canadian provinces were the cheapest that could be built, it being possible to put affoat in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia a vessel of this description fully equal in appearance to one built in Maine and at a cost of several dollars less per ton. If, under such favoring conditions wood cannot compete with iron or steel, Canada has but one alterna tive, if she would maintain her ship yards, of seeking materials among the products of the mine rather than of the forest. In this new departure builders in the United States have already got the start, and by a long dis-tance. On the Delaware river, convenient to the iron and coal mines of Pennsylvania, no less than fifty-six vessels have been constructed during the present year, five of them wholly of steel, and the indications are still more promising for the year 1884. It is claimed that the progress made in the Delaware yards since January 1st is equal to the entire business done
